Conducting and publishing health research is critical for students, researchers, and institutions. However, it is an arduous and time-consuming process. 60% of manuscripts are rejected by journals. Writing an original article in a manner that will likely be accepted by high impact journals for publishing can be challenging.

Elsevier offers the Health Research Development Program, a customized program comprising interactive workshops and data services to support leading healthcare organizations in achieving their research goals.

In this session, we will discuss the overall research process, highlighting some of the most frequently observed reasons for manuscript rejection, as well as share examples of manuscript elements that attract positive attention from Editors.
